The classical method for producing chlorine gas is by the electrolysis of brine. The consumption of power is usually balanced to about 5 or 6 kW per ton of chlorine, but if electrolysis is conducted in an autoclave it is possible to reduce the power consumption. The brine used for this purpose must of course be composed primarily of chlorine and often contains small amounts of sodium hydroxide, chlorine, sulphur, ammonia and others. Chlorine gas is produced by means of electrolysis of brine by passing an electric current through the brine at temperatures of approximately 40.degree. C. to 60.degree. C. The so-called partial-anodic reaction is then carried out in an electrolytic cell of any desired shape, and the chlorine is usually liberated in the air at or near the cathode. The reaction is reversible and halogen gas accumulates at the anode. The principal disadvantages of this process are the high cost of the apparatus, the requirement of electrical energy, and the relatively low gas production per unit of electrical energy applied to the electrodes. Alternatives to the classical method include the electrolysis of salt solutions from which magnesium and calcium have been separated off by means of hydromagnesite or hydrocalumite, the magnesium hydroxide or calcium hydroxide respectively is precipitated from solutions of electrolyte containing MgCl.sub.2 or CaCl.sub.2. But although the magnesium or calcium is available at the surface of the electrolyte, it has not been possible to transfer magnesium or calcium from the electrolyte to the electrolyte. The basic principle of the electrolysis of a solution containing magnesium or calcium chloride is that magnesium or calcium chloride in the electrolyte is reduced at the cathode by the chlorine gas and deposits as magnesium or calcium hydroxide at the cathode. The advantages of the electrochemical method of producing magnesium and calcium are the greatly reduced power consumption, and a reduction of the costs in the apparatus. The Mg and Ca-chloride formed, however, at the cathode remain unchanged as a solution containing magnesium and calcium in the electrolyte and only slowly pass
